Strengthening General Aviation Security for the 21st Century

David Heyman

Director of the CSIS Homeland Security Program

The Department of Homeland Security (DHS) has spearheaded multiple efforts over the past twenty-four months to close vulnerabilities in general aviation. They include advanced vetting of general aviation passengers and flight crews, establishing security standards for large aircraft operators, enhancing screening for radiological and nuclear materials, and harmonizing general aviation security protocols with foreign allies. DHS is about to introduce another important security measure for transatlantic general aviation.

Please join CSIS and Secretary Chertoff for an update on the latest measure, and the department's risk-based approach to the issue of aviation security.
